Searching

For those whose student days reside in mature memories, it was like mining for gold: sifting through mounds of material, searching for a nugget, hoping to unearth an information mother lode.

Toiling on a term paper meant rummaging about musty library stacks, juggling piles of handwritten note cards, extracting gems from obscure sources.
This mandatory, mind-stretching exercise demanded academic discipline, developed intellectual “muscle”, even garnered an occasional glittering grade.

Physical mining remains strenuous.
Mining information is now streamlined;
simplified by powerful computer search engines

programmed to capture, catalog, retrieve, serve.

Need information about “Extinct New Zealand Birds”, “Medieval Celtic Music”, or “2nd Century Roman Coins”?

A few keyboard strokes, mouse clicks launch today’s inquirer into information-clogged cyberspace where thousands of sources materialize in hundredths of a second.

Google rules!
Accessible, addictive, instantaneous information portal.

Warning!
Individual results may vary.
Repeated use
does not guarantee wisdom.
