PRAIRIE TIDE

*Before the billboards, neon lights,
Before the asphalt, gaseous fumes,
Rose the prairie tide. . .
Coarse grass that lay in the wind,
Changing waves upon a stalky sea,
Blowing freely, tall as horses, marching miles. . .
A green ocean of primeaval territory.
Here and there a prairie grove
With wagon, home and cemetery
Raises shadows from the depths
And helps a man on his way home
Set his sights on waving treetops,
By dead reckoning navigating,
On horseback traveling steady.
This night, he will not battle fight
Alone at sunset midst the grasses,
For lamplight dispels the massive prairie
Rising behind his back.
The asphalt strand secures the course
Where once the lonely void enforced
The rigorous pace of anxious man
Within the prairie tide.*

ON VIEWING A STALAGMITE, IN A DEEP CAVERN

*Living rock, glazed with the oil of time,
In the solitary dark you toil unknown,
Potter of centuries, no worldly affairs
Distract you from your silent throne.
Dumb and vegetable is your gaze,
Next to my lamp how dull your glor;
I'm amused by your torpid ways—
Solemnly, you stare at me and grow.*

— Charlie Kostelnick
